Market Commentary

Newspaper headlines continue to be dominated by the outbreak amongst humans from one of the coronavirus family, namely COVID-19. Clearly, the health aspects take priority, but economically, this event has led to large movements in financial markets around the world. Investors have experienced significant losses on their equity portfolios with all markets posting losses from the more 'modest' 4% drop in New Zealand, to the larger 8-10% falls in Europe, UK, Japan and the US. Unsurprisingly, bond markets have seen yields fall (i.e. prices increase) meaning that investors in diversified portfolios have had some protection.

The New Zealand dollar continued to fall, with February seeing another 4% drop against the US dollar following a similar drop in January. These falls mean that foreign currency has appreciated in value to NZ investors and so having foreign assets unhedged has provided some protection from the equity losses. For example the year to date losses from global equities in local currency terms have been around 10%, but in NZ dollar terms (unhedged) the returns have only just been negative at around -1%. This demonstrates something of the diversifying benefit of having some foreign currency exposure in our portfolios. Our exposure to 'alternatives' within the diversified portfolios was partially successful in this recent equity sell-off. The Option Fund fell in value a similar way to global equities due to plunging yields on the US 10-year treasuries against which it writes options, but the multi-manager liquid alternative portfolio fell just 0.75% thus providing the element of protection we desire from this sector.

Fund Commentary

Protection from the defensive part of the portfolio wasn't sufficient to offset the larger losses from the higher risk components. The Growth Fund returned -4.6% in February.
