Market Commentary

The returns from NZ bonds were negative in November as interest rates moved higher in yield, breaking the strong run of returns enjoyed since April this year. Relative performance to benchmark was moderately negative primarily due to the longer duration position, or greater exposure to interest rate movements. Some of the negative impact from rising rates was mitigated by sectors such as credit and inflation linked bonds that performed reasonably well. On a positive note, with yields now higher the prospects for future returns from bonds look better.

The rise in yields in November brought an abrupt end to the trend of falling interest rates. The extent of the move higher was likely exacerbated by long market maturity positioning. Over the past months NZ interest rates had remained supported by the view that further rate cuts would continue to support bonds at close to record lows in yield. The change in market expectations and sharp unwind higher in yield was driven by a combination of factors. NZ economic data has mostly been stronger than expectations, with sectors such as housing, employment, and exports surprisingly robust, but this had so far been largely ignored until the catalyst of a “successful “vaccine grabbed headlines around the world. Further upward pressure was added with the government’s focus on house price inflation and a step back in rate cut rhetoric from the RBNZ at their November meeting seeing a knee jerk reaction higher in rates.

At month end the 3-year government bond finished 22 basis points higher, the 5-year 29 basis points, and 10 year finished 30 basis points higher in yield, although rates finished higher, they were around 15 basis points lower than their intra month peak. On a sector basis swaps and credit outperformed government bonds, and shorter maturity bonds that have less price sensitivity to rising interest rates outperformed longer maturity bonds. We believe that the best strategy is to focus on positioning the funds to outperform over the medium to long term. Positioning the fund with a higher yield than benchmark and buying quality credit should continue to support returns.

Fund Commentary

The fund underperformed the Bloomberg NZ Bond Credit benchmark over the month. The main driver of negative returns was the rise higher in interest rates and the fund’s longer duration positioning. Credit holdings continued to perform reasonably well in comparison to swaps and government bonds. We will continue to focus on maintaining a higher portfolio yield through buying quality non-government bond issues.
